

Perte de données suite à une catastrophe naturelle et récupération de données en Europe

Whether it's a memorable photograph, video or any official document, the data in any form whatsoever are invaluable. Once lost, some data may never be recreated or involve a significant investment in time and money to regain their original level. If the lost data are of commercial importance, the consequences may be larger and cause a huge loss both commercial and personal. Whatever the precautions we take, loss of data due to a natural disaster can never be prevented and the devastating effects are still out of proportion. In such cases frustrating loss of data, data recovery services are a boon for those who have responded.

I made my own recent experience. It was a Saturday afternoon, August 7. As it rained for almost 4-5 days and I was not at my desk, I decided to spend quality time with my family. Usually, my job allows me to rest quietly at home, so it was really relaxing to stay indoors. We made a delicious lunch, watched a movie and talked a lot, the whole family was in one piece. Around 16h, I received a call from the office informing me that a dam at the outlet of the city had surrendered and that rain water had already begun to enter office. I went out to see what was happening outside, but I had to turn back halfway. I had never seen a situation like this, the flood waters entered the city and the roads were almost drowned. We were on the 2nd floor to 21h, our ground floor was already half-drowned. We moved all the important accessories of the ground floor and passed a helpless position.

It lasted two days, until Tuesday morning the flood level begins to drop. We went to see the condition of the house, our underground garage was still flooded. We just pumped it toward the outside, our new car was in a state that my wife could not help but cry. Suddenly I remembered that my office laptop was left inside the car and was no longer operable. All my client records and financial transactions in recent months were inside. I panicked and went straight to the office of the administrator of the system. He checked everything, suggested a test drive with experts to recover some data and told me that there was little chance of retrieve the data.

It Stellar Data Recovery, I called and they took my laptop to a preliminary analysis. After a day, they called me and said that all data had been retrieved successfully. I was full of gratitude towards the company and experts.

Later, I inquired about Stellar and I discovered that it is a provider of data recovery in Europe.
