

Look for a Notary Public

A notary is just a public executive commissioned by the Secretary of State, or other appointing authority, under the laws of different states. He is legally empowered to witness the signing of documents, particularly on court documents such as for example affidavits, and administer oaths in depositions and other situations. Though notaries often deal with sensitive legal documents, they're not allowed to give lawful representation, counsel or services. They've no role in the preparation of any papers to be notarized.

Generally, you'll find a notary public at county offices, such as the register of deeds office, the county clerk office and other departmental offices. Notary publics can be found at post offices, college or university registrar offices, mortgage companies, banks and other financial institutions, insurance companies and law offices.

Though notaries are public officials, the majority are persons who work in private companies and have a state approved test to become notary publics. Large institutions that process a lot of official procedures have a number of licensed notary publics. A lot of persons who work at court houses may also be notaries.

Local town or city clerk's offices usually maintain a database of commissioned notary publics. Yellow pages of the telephone directory include listings of businesses and individuals who offer notary public services beneath the title Notary Publics.
